NYU Furman Center for Real Estate & Urban Policy
Open Search
Postdoctoral Researchers

The Furman Center for Real Estate and Urban Policy at New York University invites applications for a post-doctoral research position. The Furman Center, jointly housed at NYU’s School of Law and its Wagner Graduate School of Public Service, is a leading academic research center devoted to the public policy aspects of land use, real estate development and housing. The Fellow’s time is shared equally between independent research on topics of his or her choice and preparation to enter the academic job market, and Furman Center research projects, conducted jointly with faculty members, graduate students, and staff. Recent projects have addressed such topics as the consequences of mortgage foreclosures, the effects of inclusionary zoning, the impact of housing vouchers on crime, and the motives driving the decisions of higher income households to move into relatively low-income neighborhoods. Fellowships typically last two years and may begin as early as summer 2016. The position comes with a salary and generous benefits.

Qualifications include a Ph.D. in Economics, Statistics, or other quantitative social science discipline; experience working with large data sets; strong econometrics skills; strong oral and written communications skills; strong skills in programming for data analysis (such as in Stata or SAS), and the ability to work as part of a team and to meet deadlines. Interest in housing, real estate or local public finance and knowledge of GIS are pluses.

To apply: Applicants should submit a cover letter, curriculum vitae, and 3 reference letters. Send application materials and questions to furmanjobs@nyu.edu. Please include “Post-Doc Research Position” in the subject line. Review of applications will begin immediately. Only candidates of interest will be contacted.

New York University is an Equal Opportunity/Affirmative Action Employer.