I would like to call your attention to two open positions in the Dept. of Agricultural & Resource Economics at UC Davis. One position is a standard teaching-research position in applied econometrics. We are hoping for someone who can teach in the finance and/or marketing areas within our large Managerial Economics major and also contribute applied work in one of our main research areas--agricultural economics, resource-environmental economics, or economic development.

The second position is unique for us, and I would appreciate your help in getting the word out on it. It is the equivalent of a tenure track assistant professor position, but with an increased emphasis on undergraduate teaching. The official position title is Lecturer with Potential for Security of Employment. We particularly seek someone who has background to teach in the finance or marketing areas. This is an ideal opportunity for someone who wants a career focused more heavily on teaching with commensurately lower research expectations than under a typical teaching-research appointment.
